Essentially, that is what this is. Instead of looking for words, the puzzle-solving dynamo that is yourself is tasked with looking for repeating patterns. Essentially, this is like an exercise routine for the brain. This would be enough to make the great Dr. Kawashima of Brain Age fame very proud indeed. That said, there are a few drawbacks. For one, all of the emoji sequences you are searching for are equally short in length (five symbols). I would have liked to see some variance in the length of the sequences. If nothing else, this would have added a bit more variety to the puzzle mix. My other issue is with the emojis themselves. They are very bland, and don't really jump off the pages like emojis should. Emojis are meant to convey emotion, which these ones don't. Truthfully, I don't like word searches, especially the way they are used in modern American education. I see them as an unnecessary evil. They are busywork in the truest sense of the word. They don't teach anything, except perhaps frustration. However, this isn't a word search. I gave these puzzles to a group of fourth graders to solve. Although they found it more challenging than a typical boring waste-of-time word search, they really enjoyed it! I think this is also a great exercise for young-brains, because it allows them the opportunity to memorize and recognize patterns. Overall, this is a really great product. As long as you are buying this for the unique concept, and not the emoji artwork, then I think you will be satisfied with this product. It is inexpensive and well-worth the investment.

By M. V. Kolar I get annoyed at the regular word search puzzles but looking for symbols is easier on the eyes! I find myself to enjoy them much more and not to get stressed out. I think that they actually might be better for 'seniors' and I've noticed in sharing with friends that the males, who tend to be more visually oriented, really enjoy them.
